"People respond much more to authentic, human-centric design now," said Chee Pearlman, a design consultant. "As opposed to the extruded-plastic sort from China. It's clearly a time for genuine connection to the objects in our lives."

From The New York Times, Holiday Gifts With a Story to Tell, by Penelope Green, November 25, 2009

Handmade by: Shatley & Stewart Fine Art

"Knowing where your food comes from, or your clothes, is extending to wanting to know where your dining room table comes from. It really matters. And I think what makes gifts in particular special is knowing there's a person who made it and a story behind it. I think people want to buy things that tell stories, especially in an age when so few store-bought items tell stories."
